You Don't Know Everything - Part 3, The 4 "R's" of Respect

I know it is the Christmas season and not to be a modern day Ebenezer Scrooge but this article is probably a bit overdue and just happens to land in December. I wish everyone a very Merry Christmas this year and a happy New Year as well! but...I have to be honest; this is going to be a segment on common sense metal detecting etiquette, self-reliance, and how people have allowed their bad interpersonal skills to infect this hobby as it does the rest of their lives. Please note, this isn't directed at anyone in this club or the behavior of anyone in this club. This is something we need to be mindful of moving into 2026 though and help those we encounter be better stewards of the hobby :) This segment has probably affected me personally one too many times. I guess the argument can be made that some folks really don't know any better but I think a lot of what I'm about to say is just sadly commonplace.

We all love to detect in this group and we also all love to find, and to spend time with folks that enjoy the same. Unfortunately, the priority "to find" all too often masks our sense of fairness and loving thy neighbor. This being the holidays I'll also say that we all need to do better, myself included, not just this time of the year but all year. Okay, so what am I getting at? Detecting ethics really fall into what I'm going to call here the 4 "R's" of Respect:

Respect of Owners: If you are out door knocking or making calls, please make sure that if you secure a permission, you are up front with the landowner from the beginning. What do I mean by that? Well make sure you discuss what happens to finds, does the owner keep everything? (offer, offer often to share the finds you'd be surprised most don't want anything). How often will you be back, are you being granted a onetime hunt? You'd be surprised how often it happens that folks outlive their welcome, not so much because a landowner doesn't want you there more than once, but you never asked. Ask. Also, be clear about the size of your holes, that you'll take your trash with you, that you'll be good stewards of their property. Last but not least, if you are going to show up with a truckload of detectorists and not just yourself, clear that first. I once inquired about a field permission from a farmer that was super hesitant to let me detect it. Why? Because one of my detectorist friends had gotten permission around his farmhouse the year before and showed up with two trucks full of people and Go-pro cameras to film the hole rat race...they were asked to leave shortly into this event. Common courtesy can stop sudden disappointment. Also, make sure if you are detecting a public or detectable area that you've confirmed that it is open to detecting and please no night hawking. Night hawking is the practice of detecting (mostly fields) properties you don't have permission for at night so that people don't see you are there...night hawking without permission is still trespassing. Lastly, always make sure you check to see if you can detect property during deer season. I shouldn't have to say this but not asking about this is a no no.

Respect of History: (not talking about history of the finds, but that is important): How many times have you gotten a permission, even a long standing one and drive by or hear that someone (and in the worst cases one of your digging buddies) is out detecting that very site? I have. It is awkward and problematic. In most cases the landowner doesn't care, he or she may have let many people detect their property (oddly that is often an excuse made not to let you have permission yourself). Let's be honest though, if you get a permission and you have an agreement with the landowner that it isn't a one-off, that you can come back many times through the years and you bring a friend with you who 2 weeks later just shows up there without you, that is bad form. If you are that person, please be considerate to the time it took your friend to secure the permission for the both of you, I'm not even suggesting you should detect without them but if you do, please be honorable and ask the friend who currently has the permission. It also confuses owners. You may have permission for all a farmer's fields and now he's seeing different people on different pieces of land constantly and now has to check to see who they are. Respect a permission holder's history of the site.

Respect of Others (other detectorists): Piggy backing off of the last Respect of History, there are other situations that come up from time to time that fall in line with respecting our detecting brethren. If you detect with others and you let the other persons/s always be the one to door knock, research, line up permissions and transport you to the site PLEASE consider taking your turn. Now, not everyone is good at every one of those things but if you don't try you won't grow as a person. It is good to step out of your comfort zone. Also, if you make a plan try to stick to it, regardless of time to meet, where and even as far as bringing all your gear...maybe an extra pinpointer is helpful sometimes, leave it in your trunk and you won't be the one that always forgets something. Also, if you have someone researching sites and they are on the down low, like maybe nobody knows something was there please don't get on social media and disclose the location, even if your digging buddy didn't mind the landowner probably doesn't want countless people asking for permission. Just be kind and considerate above all. Also, please try to resist the urge on FB and other social media sites or even at club meetings to belittle someone else's finds, maybe you find key date silver every time you go out but the new person in the club may not and you were the newbie at one point as well.

Respect of the Environment: Remember, when we are detecting we are guests on that land, don't tear up driveways, dig bad plugs, leave plugs open and always pick up your trash and take with you ...why (because as the Hoover Boys always say) "All holes matter".
